Mission: 'Restaurant Impossible'

BY JOHN TANASYCHUK
Staff writer

If you own or work at a struggling South Florida restaurant, the producers of Food Network's "Restaurant Impossible" want to hear from you. On every episode of the show, chef Robert Irvine remakes a failing restaurant, taking aim at everything from decor to menu and training.

"It needs to be a restaurant that is quite literally struggling, a restaurant that's nearly on the way out, that's been losing a lot of money over the last few months or year," casting producer Mathew Klickstein says.

Many of the owners of restaurants featured on the show have not been paying themselves and are thinking about shutting their doors. Since the show is coming to South Florida, Klickstein says the full-service restaurant should be on the beach or within a mile of the beach. They'd like to title the show "Paradise Impossible."

"We really want a restaurant where you get that paradise sense: palm trees, white sands," explains Klickstein, who says it would also be helpful if staff included some interesting characters.

Shooting will take place over two days in mid April.

Klickstein says that unlike similar restaurant-makeover shows, "Restaurant Impossible" has been putting restaurants back on track for eight years.

"Aside from the national and regional publicity that being on the show can elicit, Robert Irvine and his team really know what they're doing. Our success rate is extremely high," Klickstein argues. "A vast majority of our restaurants are still in business years later."

Juanes' latest album, "Loco de Amor," is set for release Tuesday.

A lot to like about Juanes

Colombian rocker's new album offers synthed-up sound, courtesy U2 producer Steve Lillywhite.

When last we heard from Colombian rocker Juanes, the Key Biscayne resident's charismatic energy was on high beam for "Juanes: MTV Unplugged," the 2012 live set recorded at the New World Center on Miami Beach that went on to win a Grammy for best Latin pop album.

A follow-up to the underwhelming 2010 studio album "P.A.R.C.E.," the Juan Luis Guerra-produced "Unplugged" was an ideal setting for the organic warmth and pure, rock 'n' roll revelry that radiates from Juanes, especially on such sing-along hits as "Es Por Ti," "A Dios le Pido" and "La Camisa Negra."

Handsome, articulate and politically fearless, Juanes has always seemed ripe for the kind of crossover that longtime followers regard with suspicion if not outright horror. This may explain the look you see on the faces of those fans as their headphones fill with "Mil Pedazos" (1,000 Pieces), the opening track on Juanes' album "Loco de Amor," set for release Tuesday and produced by Steve Lillywhite, most famous for his work with Irish rock icons U2.

Bumping along to a key-board-bedazzled dance beat, with Juanes falling in and out of an Enrique Iglesias-style falsetto, "Mil Pedazos" is just the kind of ultra-produced pop confection that Juanes adherents dread most. Bruce Springsteen fans may recall the shudder they felt at the pandering "Dancing in the Dark."

Fear not. Redemption comes quickly on "Loco de Amor."

The title track is a successful mixed marriage of classic conga and fuzzy synthesizers, its irresistible bounce swinging seamlessly into the handclap-driven rocker "La Luz" and the twangy mandolin-and-synth mashup "La Verdad" (the falsetto works this time).

For fans of Juanes the uncomplicated romantic, the album's salvation is complete with "Una Flor," a shimmering, joyful love letter on the order of "Es Por Ti," Juanes' acoustic guitar and voice augmented by not much more than snare and handclaps. The soulful "Me Enamoré de Ti" is a rewarding power ballad, with gentle interludes of classical guitar, violin and cello, that seems destined for the setlist of Juanes' next tour.

Lillywhite leads the singer to some unusual places on the second half of the album: "Delirio" lurches to life with a dark, urban dance thump that would do Depeche Mode proud before finding its footing on more sturdy and familiar power-pop terrain.

"Persiguiendo el Sol," zags the other way with a Southern-rock guitar opening and a sunny, windows-rolled-down rock vibe sprinkled with waves of Edge-style guitar. It's a pleasant ride.

With its reliance on synthesizers and other tools of the modern-rock motif, "Loco de Amor" risks turning off fans unaccustomed to hearing Juanes so plugged in. But the singer, who acknowledged some burnout after the release of "P.A.R.C.E.," had to go someplace new, and "Loco de Amor" is a strong bridge to Juanes' sound of the future.

Acrobatics

Peking Acrobats: Forget simple cartwheels and backflips: These Chinese acrobats want to defy gravity. The troupe's members, who have appeared in films such as "Ocean's Eleven" and on TV series such as "The Wayne Brady Show," will leap, trick-cycle and juggle on and above the Broward Center stage at 7 p.m. Tuesday. Expect them to reprise their Guinness World Record-setting, 21-foot-tall human chair stack. 7 p.m. Tuesday, $15-$85. 954-462-0222 or Broward-Center.org.

Music

Melissa Manchester: The Grammy-winning singer-songwriter is halfway done recording her 20th album, "You Gotta Love the Life," an elegant roundup of American Songbook covers spanning Cole Porter to Rodgers and Hammerstein. So we're hopeful she'll deliver a preview of the album, which was funded through an Indiegogo campaign, when she stops by the Colony Hotel's Royal Room (155 Hammon Ave. Palm Beach) at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday. Her performances will continue nightly through Saturday. $65-$75 for show only, $130-$140 for dinner and show. 561-655-5430 or The-ColonyPalmBeach.com.

Theater

Anne Deavere Smith: For five seasons, she has been the sharp, take-no-guff hospital administrator on Showtime's Emmy-winning "Nurse Jackie." But Smith is a woman of many bona fides. She's an author ("Letters to a Young Artist" and "Talk to Me: Listening Between the Lines"); the winner of a National Endowment for the Humanities Medal; and a playwright whose works tackle race, identity and social issues, and whose one-woman shows have been broadcast on PBS' "Great Performances." On Tuesday night, she'll present one of those shows, "Reclaiming Grace in the Face of Adversity," at the Mizner Park Cultural Arts Center (225 NE Mizner Blvd., Suite 500) as part of Festival of the Arts Boca. $30-$50. 561-368-8445 or FestivalOfTheArtsBoca.org.
