put together," his daughter said.

Unscripted for her talk, Bernstein said she'll read letters her parents wrote while her mother was visiting her family in Chile and her father was finishing up the score.

"He was very fond of having us around and always invited us to rehearsals and on the road. That's how we learned so much music," she said about her siblings, Alexander and Nina Bernstein Simmons, also keepers of his legacy.

Guest conductor Jayce Ogren has done this show at least five times, and he's coming in to conduct the Festival Orchestra BOCA.

"The tempos are set to go with Jerome Robbins' choreography... For an orchestra, the first rehearsal is a shock...," he said. "The music is non-stop and complicated, and then the task of coordinating the film with the live orchestra."

How does he do it? With an earpiece, click track [audio cues], and a video screen in front of him with different color lines.

"They show the different beats and they indicate when a number is about to start so I know when to bring the orchestra in," he said.

A technical director travels with the production, brings the equipment and makes sure all the components work together.

"Audiences are completely enchanted by this show, and having the live orchestra heightens this great piece," Ogren said.

The family reached out to Ogren after he conducted Bernstein's "A Quiet Place" in 2010.

"I became high on their list of conductors, so I was asked to conduct in London based on that relationship," he said. The first time he did "West Side Story" with orchestra was with the Royal Philharmonic.

"Any conductor and orchestra can do this if they want to, and sign up and get the license," for the music, Bernstein said. "We advocate for it. We want it done often. 'West Side Story' is his most well-known work, so it's a way of reintroducing it.

"As time goes by, the next generation is less and less likely to know who Leonard Bernstein is," she said about her father, who died in 1990 at 72. The New York Times headlined his obit "Music Monarch" and called him "one of the most prodigally talented and successful musicians in American history."

"Today's kids might have seen the movie, but they might not have," Bernstein said. "We want to find ways to reintroduce his music to the world."
