Reunited with singer Gleason, SoFla's Further Seems Forever will perform in FAT Village

In the first nine years of its existence, the South Florida indie-rock band Further Seems Forever married and divorced three lead singers. While some breakups were amicable, others were bitter.

For the second vocalist, Jason Gleason, the breakup was rough. He joined the band at age 19, something he describes as a dream come true. Under his lead, in 2003, Further Seems Forever released their second album, "How To Start a Fire," which sold more than 100,000 copies. They toured with New Found Glory and Hot Rod Circuit. Yet Gleason left the band in early 2004.

"We all spent too much time with each other, packed in a box, and I was considerably younger, and all of us were considerably younger, and maybe we didn't do the right thing all the time," recalls Gleason, who is now 33 and living in New Jersey. "I'm sure I annoyed the crap out of them as much as they annoyed me at the time."

Nearly 13 years later, Gleason has reunited with Further Seems Forever for a tour on which the band performs songs from "How To Start a Fire." "I think we all regretted not really talking about it," he says. "But I think those regrets and those looking back on things is sort of what brought us together, too. It started with repairing the relationship and becoming friends again."

On Saturday, Further Seems Forever will headline For the Love Music Festival, taking place in FAT Village in Fort Lauderdale. The festival will feature more than 30 bands and musicians, including Jacob Jeffries, MewithoutYou and Civilian, as well as food trucks and arts-and-crafts vendors.

"This is a showcase for the bands," says Sara Shake, a festival co-founder. "Some of these people have been around for a long time, and others are just starting out."

For Further Seems Forever, this will be only their third show since reuniting with Gleason, and the first one in South Florida.

"We're actually playing the songs of the album, but in a set list that we may have played back in the day," Gleason says.

Further Seems Forever also reunited with its first lead singer, Chris Carrabba, in 2010. Carrabba, best known as the leader of Dashboard Confessional, is currently on break from the band while Gleason is on tour.

"I think people can expect the same thing that we always gave," Gleason says. "I came down and rehearsed in January, and it was kind of like we picked up right where we left off," Gleason says. "Just letting the music speak for itself and rock 'n' roll."

For the Love Music Festival will take place Saturday, March 12, in FAT Village, 541 NW First Ave, in Fort Lauderdale. Tickets cost $35, or $125 for VIP, which includes parking. Call 954-900-3691 or go to ForTheLoveFestival.com.
