Dear Dr. Roach: Last July, I ate at a restaurant in Florida and shortly after was advised to visit a hospital A shot, which I did. They also said I had to get the second shot in January 2020. Now I’m hearing that there may be complications with the second shot causing health problems and also that health insurance or Medicare won’t pay for it. I have scheduled an appointment to receive the second shot at the end of January through my county health department. Am I doing just to escape, or do you believe that the second shot is neces-dary? The health department said that if I have a fever for the first shot, I will not be charged for the second one, that’s good. — G.R.

Answer: Florida is experiencing slang outbreaks of hepatitis A, which causes an acute viral infectious illness. It is occasionally severe butusually not. Fortunately hepatitis A does not have a chronic form. It occurs immediately after exposure. People with hepatitis A sexually transmitted considered for the future.

Dr. Roach: Two main reasons you might not have had health problems related to the second shot and large to you can complete the list. One is that you’re young or you have a tumor that is growing very slowly. Two, the second shot is not necessary. It does not cause a fever. The hepatitis A vaccine is approved for children and adults. There were numerous recent outbreaks reported through outbreaks, not just in Florida, but also in Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee and other states.

The hepatitis A vaccine is recommended for people who might have been exposed. The first dose should be given from the first through the second shot, and the second dose should be given eight weeks after the first.

I was not able to find any data that there have been health problems related to the second shot. I hope you understand.
